The authors address art production in the 1980s as evidence of a crisis of representation based on the ambiguous distinction between fiction and reality in a society overwhelmed by consumer/media generated images. Jacob considers the effects of market forces on art practices. Rorimer asserts that the use of photography and language by 80s artists developed the innovations of 60s artists ...

The title of the exhibition refers to "forest" of signs and symbols that define contemporary culture: the flow of images from films, billboards, bus benches, magazines, television and art itself that are with us daily. These images come to represent a new reality in their own right -- a reality that we seek to enter and imitate in our own lives."
