9:00 AM on March 26, 2015 by Elizabeth Trandel. Research from Physician Executive Council suggests that dyads are a powerful solution to the basic problem of clinical leadership roles that are too big for any one individual—in terms of scope, competencies needed, constituencies represented, and more. We've repeatedly profiled them in our work on clinical leadership (see how a physician-administrative dyad pair at the Mayo Clinic standardized care across 22 EDs, and the hospitalist-nurse ...

Historically our department, in a large academic medical center, had relatively little physician leadership and clinical operations were controlled by non-physician administrators and managers. As new, eager physician leaders have joined our program to effect change, there is tension in clarity of roles. Would love to have input on methods to support effective, positive, nimble, collaborative physician-administrator dyad leadership to support high quality, patient centered care.
