Work Less, Live More was written before the 2008 financial crisis, so many of its suggestions seem laughable now (especially the repeated suggestion that semi-retirees can subsist on owning and flipping multiple homes). I appreciated the focus on how semi-retirement differs from the initial idea of retirees spending their languid days with no worthwhile pursuits, and some of the ideas of ways to find meaning and small income after leaving a 9-5 job were quite interesting.

Fewer hours means more jobs are available to people who need them. Living on less pay usually means consuming less, making more of the things one needs at home, and living lighter, whether by design or by accident. Today, driven both by necessity and the deliberate choice to live simply, more Americans are shifting toward fewer work hours.

When you live frugally, you have a much better chance or spending less than you earn. You can then use the difference to pay off debt, save, or invest. Or, all three! Plus, when you need less money to live, your earning needs reduce, too. You can work less, retire early, take time to travel. In short, you have more lifestyle choices open to you.

As our individual hours of work have increased, so the general pace of life has sped up. An international study from the 1990s used walking speed as proxy measure for the pace of life, and found that sure enough, the very steps we take have accelerated annually, over the last 15 years. Yet somehow the faster we go, the less time we seem to have.
